Brent Leideritz is an Adelaide-based artist who's practice interrogates identity, producing works that seek to question identity formation, oppression and liberation through family, cultural structures, kin and communities. These interrogations coalesce into larger photographic collections that explore themes such as: the human condition and connectivity; resistance of oppressive structures; cultural agitation for positive discourse; and challenging religious and societal norms. Their practice challenges normative ways of being, providing a space to those that are 'other' to be seen.

A photographic reclamation for new ways of being, through the act of queering, oppositional action, and communal play.

Divergent archetypes for old ideas is a collection of photographic portraits and promptographic resolutions that foreground aspiring ways of being, where queer and alternative performances of self stand against religious notions of shame and judgement. With research as photographer, and subject, and in collaboration with my 'othered' community, we actively queer and playfully weaponise: creative space for individual agency; self-expression; gender performativity; and the erotic. In deconstructing, reconstructing, recontextualising and appropriating religious binary archetypes and narratives, this project enables the empowerment of selves and communities alike, and in doing so, presents their truth, to inspire those who have felt harmed, scared, closeted, and ashamed, to be whom they wish to be for themselves, and those they love.

Developing their practice from within 'othered' communities as a neurovariant, queer, goth, freak, Brent gives space for playful opposition, collaboration, gender queering and representation. This creates space for communal deconstruction and reconstruction of the symbolism, myth and narratives that exist within normative and conservative society. Brent's work creates an ever-unfolding set of questions for viewers to explore, and in doing so, asks those who see the resultant photographic artworks to consider a viewpoint that may differ from their own, as a way to move beyond dated binaries of the past.
